The Prologue, a Pamphlet: Consisting of Contributions From Graduates of Several Universities: Prose and Some Verse (Classic Reprint) By Henry Seidel Canby

Excerpt from The Prologue, a Pamphlet: Consisting of Contributions From Graduates of Several Universities: Prose and Some Verse

Here were football games in the autumn, and good times and hard work in the winter term, but he remembered best and oftenest of his college life the Spring days in Senior year, when the windows of the old room would stay open all day long to let the pipe smoke out and the vines in. There were always some people inside then, talking of nothing that could not be said with a laugh, and always some more calling up from below. If it were toward evening, in June, they lay on the window seat with their feet in the sociable atmosphere of talk and pipe smoke, their faces dabbled by the cool wisteria blooms that hung without, and sucked long, rich lungfuls of Handsome Dan, or talked to a fellow below about a dog, until it was time to go to Mrs Markham's for supper.

That was college life as the lawyer's clerk remembered it. His desk looked out on a weary, dingy air shaft, where the sunbeams were as bedraggled as his prospects; his mind could seldom rise above contracts and incorporeal hereditaments and it is not strange if it sometimes strayed back to Spring of Senior year and the old crowd.

From the ends of the earth they were coming back for Triennial, and the lawyers clerk threw his last attempt at a brief down the air shaft and went to join them.
